

OpenTheo

#5 Qs on the life of St Paul, justification and predestination

January 16, 2019

Ask NT Wright Anything - Premier

Tom Wright talks to Justin about his new book Paul: A Biography and takes listener questions on 'justification', election and salvation and what three things he would ask Paul if he were alive today.

For prize draws, bonus content and to ask a question sign up at www.askntwright.com

For podcast listener discounts on Tom's video courses www.ntwrightonline.org/askntwright

For NT Wright in conversation with Tom

Holland <https://www.premierchristianradio.com/Shows/Saturday/Unbelievable/Episodes/Unbelievable-NT-Wright-and-Tom-Holland-How-St-Paul-changed-the-world>

Subscribe to the podcast via PodBean, iTunes or RSS Feed

Transcript

[Music] Premier Podcast.

[Music]

[Music] The Ask NTY Anything podcast.

[Music] Welcome, welcome to the show where I sit down with leading New Testament scholar Tom Wright and ask your questions.

The podcast is produced by Premier in partnership with SBCK and NTY Right Online. I'm Justin Bally, Theology and Apologetics Editor for Premier. So glad you're with us for today's show, drawing once again on the thought and theology of Tom Wright, research professor of New Testament and early Christianity.

At the University of St Andrews, he's a celebrated author and theologian, of course. Do rate and review us on iTunes or wherever you get your podcast from. Let others know about the show.

It was really great that in the first few weeks that we launched back in November 2018, the show was topping the Religion and Spirituality podcast charts in the UK, Canada, and I think it got into the top 10 in the USA as well. Great to have that kind of profile, but we want to continue that momentum going. Do let others know about the Ask NTY Right Anything podcast.

Today, Tom's going to be tackling your questions on the Apostle Paul, and we'll be talking about his recent book, Paul Biography, available now from SBCK. Congratulations, by the way, to the three winners of that book. We ran a sort of Lucky Dip competition for anyone subscribed to our newsletter, and one of the winners was Belinda, in Surrey, who was absolutely delighted to be selected.

Well, we've got a new competition right now. If you sign up to the newsletter, and anyone who has already signed up to the newsletter, you'll be entered in automatically too, sign up and you'll be in with a chance to win one of three signed copies of Tom's new translation of the New Testament. It's a very exciting book.

It's called The Bible for Everyone. It's a translation of the Old Testament by Old Testament scholar John Golden Gay, and Tom's translation of the New Testament. Wonderful prize.

It will be inscribed by Tom himself. If you want to win one of those three signed copies of the book, do subscribe to the newsletter at askentiright.com. And there's lots of other benefits that subscribing to the newsletter brings. You'll also get access to bonus content that we haven't included on today's podcast.

For instance, you'll get the video where Tom answers Stuart's question, "What do you think about the Apostle Paul speaking in tongues?" So if you register now, you'll get exclusive access to that and other videos, and of course, all the bonus stuff we put on the newsletter from week to week, askentiright.com to get yourself signed up. Well, here we are again, Tom, meeting over, coffee and croissants and orange juice, and just having a good old chat. I am incredibly privileged to be able to record these with you, these podcasts, where we look at a variety of themes.

I have no shame in saying I am a quote unquote fanboy of yours. That's the modern terminology. Yes, it is.

So you've been writing and researching Paul for decades now, haven't you? Yes. I mean, the last, well, a couple of years ago I had you on when you wrote your magna mopus, which was actually amazing. It's five years ago.

That was that came out. Yeah, it's extraordinary. It's gone to the two volumes, sort of very academically.

Paul and faithfulness have gone. Yes, yes. And is this really, I suppose, in a sense, the popular level version of what you wrote in? Well, sort of yes and no.

When I did that big book, several people, both including colleagues in the discipline, said, wish you'd do a shorter one. Of course, part of the point of the longer one was that I've been writing shorter things and articles, and people had always said, yeah, but you didn't explain this. Yes, but surely that has to be contextualized there.

Okay, you want the big thing? Here it is. And then, of course, they all said, oh, it's far too long. So Jesus said, you know, we danced for you and you wouldn't sing, and we went and you wouldn't mourn.

But this isn't exactly a potted-down version, because that was a book on Paul's mind and theology. Now, there's a lot of mind and theology in here, but part of the whole point of it is that what Paul was thinking and saying was contextualized in a rich, multi-layered life, which was to do with both his Jewish upbringing and his amazing knowledge of the Jewish scriptures, and with his contextualizing in the Roman world where he was a citizen and in the Greek world where he knew his Epicureans from his Stoics. And we see Paul navigating these things in a multi-layered way, which I find just perpetually enthralling, because I grew up with Paul who was basically a brain box who said prayers, as it were, and then the rest of it was off on the side.

And the older I've got, the more the whole man speaks to this whole man, and that's been really exciting. You probably feel like you know his era almost as well as you know your own now. Well, let's put it like this.

My students mock me because when I say the war, I mean the Jewish Roman War of 66 to 17. Not World War I or II. And they say, well, yeah, I sort of mentally live in the first thing.

I've tried to diversify more recently and get back towards our day as well. And just kind of give us a sense of how you structure this particular, because you've called it Paul a biography. And in that sense, you are trying to write something that's sort of a narrative of his life.

It's not a sort of academic book in the traditional sense. No, no, it's not at all. I mean the only footnote.

So basically references to bits of the Bible or bits of classical sources and so on. So there's no discussion of other scholarly views. Or if I do say there are various views here, I don't actually go into detail as to said it.

You can find those elsewhere. So this is going through from what we know about or can infer about his early life and how he got to the point where he was on the road to Damascus when dot dot dot. And then what happened next? And as with virtually all ancient history, there are gaps.

And that's quite normal. But when you have gaps in any narrative, ancient or modern, what you can do is put in the book. What you can do is probe cautiously from either side, as it were, the bits you do know, and say, well, it's possible this.

It's likely that or it's almost certain that, certain such. And that's what I tried to do to construct something of a gift to us 2000 years later that he was obviously a prolific letter writer. Well, he comparatively prolific, but actually the letters are short.

You know, how many volumes do we have of Cicero's letters in the nerve plastic? And they're fascinating. And they shared a flood of light on all sorts of things in first century BC Roman culture. But for Paul, we've just got these snippets because he's writing on the go.

He's not leisure sitting there with all day to compose. He's really sending bulletins from the front, as it were. And so most of his time, he isn't writing letters so far as we know.

He's talking with people, he's preaching, he's praying, he's trying to organize these little communities. And then from time to time, he has to buzz off a letter to somebody. We're kind of going to just sort of go with some of the questions that have come in today.

And if people want the full story, they can read Paul of Algrify or any of the other many books on Paul that you've written over the years. Let's start with the topic of justification because that's where a lot of people encounter what you are saying about Paul and what he had to say on that particular issue. Keith in Chambersburg, Pennsylvania says, "I've always wanted to know how NT

Wright would explain his understanding of justification to a local rural church congregation where people aren't as versed in the various schools of Pauline interpretation." Well, this is a good opportunity, I think, just to perhaps unpack for show casual listener in simple enough terms what you mean, what you think Paul meant by justification and how that's commonly been in your being misinterpreted.

It's slightly frustrating because this word simple. I've written one or two books with the word simple or simply in the title, and one of my publishers said to me once, "Tom, I have to sit you down and explain the meaning of simply." And I said, "Listen, if somebody comes to me in St Andrews where I work and says, 'Tell me how to get to Glasgow and keep it simple.' I could say, 'Just keep heading west and a bit south and you can't miss it.' But it might be kind to tell him that there's a big river which is several miles wide and that there's a mountain range and that there's this way round or that way round and you might get in a mess. So forgive the complexity, but sometimes it is actually necessary for the sake of getting you to where you need to go.

I think if I were faced with that with a congregation that had never really thought it through, what I'd like to do is to take them to Galatians chapter 2 and say, 'Let's just sit with Galatians 2 and maybe even do some role play as to what's going on in the church in Antioch.' Because this is the first time that Paul talks about justification and we presume that this makes sense, you know, I want to bring in Romans and Philippians as well, eventually, but not yet. And in Galatians, what's going on is there's a crisis because Jews and Gentiles are sharing fellowship in the Messiah, sharing table fellowship together as Christians with no distinction between them. And then some people come from Jerusalem and say, 'Shouldn't be doing this.

Gentiles, you're not supposed to be at the same table as Jews, and so please go away.' And/or the Jews separate themselves. And when Paul is talking about justification, that is the presenting issue. And our trouble with reading Galatians 2 is that because we have in our traditions, justification is, 'I'm a sinner, I need to get to heaven, so I need to be justified in order for that to happen.' We import that back into Galatians 2 and we forget what was actually going on.

And the point is that God in Christ has dealt with the sin problem, not so that we can go to heaven, but so that God by His Spirit can live in our midst, and so that we can be the family of God together, because the reason Jews didn't eat with Gentiles is that they were regarded as unclean, as automatically sinners, because they were outside the law. They were idolaters, etc, etc. And the point of the gospel for Paul is that what has happened on the cross means that anyone who is in Christ has had their sin and evil and all that dealt with, so that then there is no reason why Christians sit down.

So justification is God's declaration that all those who are in the Messiah are part of the same family and that their sins are forgiven. And it's not in that sense a transactional thing as it was sometimes presented by the Reformers. What then happens? This was an answer to the question, how might you start it off with the finished congregation? I would get them to wallow in Galatians 2 until they got the message, and then they might want to go on to Galatians 3 as well, which is about the covenant with Abraham, etc.

Sooner or later, I would want to take them through Philippians 3, which is a similar thing, but with Paul's autobiography being very central, where I had all these Jewish privileges, but I abandoned them for the sake of the Messiah, etc. Sooner or later, I would want to get to Romans, and in Romans and only in Romans, justification is reframed within a law court setting. What has happened in the Christian tradition is that people have taken the law court setting from Romans, have forgotten the covenantal and familial settings which were the original vocation in Galatians, and constructed a whole extra thing based only on a law court setting, and have then tried to work out how it works, and particularly they've tried to do so out of Romans 1 to 4 without Romans 5 to 8, but actually the argument of Romans on justification is 1 to 8, with then coming through to 9 to 11, and the whole strand of what this means for God's worldwide purposes in and through Israel, and then 12 to 16.

So it's more complicated. If you start with the post-Luther questions, then okay, we can have great fun going through the 16th, 17th century through to the 21st, different theories of how people get justified, all with a law court with either imputed righteousness or imparted righteousness or whatever. And I want to say, I know what those questions are about.

They can be extremely helpful, partially, but they can also be extremely puzzling. I believe that the Bible itself is the place to start. This is the great irony that Luther was saying, the Bible, the Bible, the Bible, but actually often his followers have forgotten.

Well, they go to Luther and they go to subsequent diminishes. Luther was quite a many-sided, rich character. He said a lot of things about a lot of things, and I don't think actually he would have radically disagreed with me about Galatians.

He might have done a bit, but already in 1955, in one of the volumes of Church Dogmatics, called Luther on his misreading of Galatians. Very interesting. So there's all sorts of issues then, but again, it's comparatively simple if you start with the Bible and allow the Bible to tell you how you should use these words.

But the problem is when a word that is in our translations of the Bible cuts loose and gets on a tradition of its own, then when people start there, they assume that what the Bible said means, what we've made that word mean, and again and again, that ain't necessarily so. This is sometimes called the New Perspective on Paul. I'm sure you would say when it's the original perspective.

And Douglas in Gibraltar says, "In the light of your understanding of the New Perspective on Paul and your reading of Romans, how would you lead someone to faith in Christ now?" That's a much bigger question, I suppose. But I suppose the question at the heart of it is something that was relatively simple maybe to present as a "here's how to become a Christian and have your sins forgiven" suddenly looks a little bit more complex or not quite as simple to explain in that. Yes, and obviously people have taken Romans, chapters 1 to 4 and have referred to it as the Romans road and have said, "Here you are, you're a sinner, Christ died for your sins, so now you can go to heaven." Of course, what they don't usually say is, "So now according to Romans 4, you're part of Abraham's family." That doesn't only make it into the script.

Exactly, but when you find yourself telling a story which then doesn't actually quite square with what's in the text, you should beware. So I would say, "Sorry, we need to complexify. We have oversimplified and we have misreadomes.

And if the question is, "How do you lead somebody to Christ?" Then again, as I said before in answer to an earlier question on another podcast, it depends entirely who they are, where they're coming from, what their background is, how much they know already. I would in all sorts of ways, rather, walk with them through one of the Gospels with Mark or John, say, "Let's just live with this and let's look at this person, Jesus. And let's ask the questions about what is his kingdom, why did he die, who is he, etc.

If in the course of that issues come up about God's whole plan, by all means let's read Romans. But Romans is like climbing the north wall of the Iga. It's a wonderful, spectacular thing and the view from the top is unmatched, but it's a tough climb.

And if you think it's actually going to be a simple Sunday afternoon stroll, then you may slip around from time to time. If it were to be boiled down into a phrase or something that you could give in simple terms, are we inviting people to become part of God's family in Christ essentially? That's the invitation that we're giving when we... That is the invitation and that is how great many people do become Christians because they realise this is a family. And it's a loving, generous, outgoing, cheerful family and they want to be part of it.

And do you have to have, as it were, if you like, signed on the dotted line of a number of things, I believe Jesus died for me. Yes. He died for my sins, rose again.

This is all the basic baptismal things and I have taken many baptisms and confirmations and I've explained to congregations that the reason we say the creed during that is that this is the badge we wear, that when I confirm somebody, and baptise somebody, say, we're not welcoming this person to the family because they're male or female or because of the colour of their skin or because they're rich or poor or anything. The only badge we wear is the badge of what we believe. And that's justification by faith, actually, that we are not defined by our background, by our ethnicity, by our previous moral background.

We are justified in Christ. Paul says three times Romans, three Philippians, three Galatians, two, we are justified in the Messiah. In other words, when God looks at us, he doesn't see us as we are, he sees us in Christo, in the Messiah.

And the Messiah has died, therefore we have left all that behind. And that takes a lifetime to work out what that then means. But that is justification by faith.

Let's open up another massive can of worms then. Staying in Romans, I suppose, Devon in Old Oxford, Surrey says, are we elected/chosen by God? Is our salvation all by grace? Or do we have to make a choice? Or do we have to make a choice? How can that be grace? All the classic questions, I'm very confused, says Devon. How do you try and present this simply? This is, of course, a classic theological problem that became very sharp edged at certain points in the Reformation, though it actually goes back way behind that, an Augustinian and Aquinas and so on.

They believe very clearly that some people were chosen by God, and some people seemed not to be. Part of the problem here is that the language of election is very much Israel language. It goes back to Deuteronomy and to the call of Abraham.

And when the New Testament is retrieving that, it's retrieving something which isn't primarily about how this person gets saved, but the way in which God is using this, what we've called before, the scandal of particularity, to reach out into the world. And that Jesus himself is the elect, he is the chosen one. This sounds for a moment very like Karl Barth, that we are chosen in him.

And Paul says that in Ephesians 3, we are chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world. But Israel's election, which is what that's modelled on, was always for the sake of the world. His major parting of the ways here, that there are some who will say God chose the Jewish people so that they would be his people, and then he seems to have extended it.

But actually, the point is in Genesis 12 and Genesis 15, Genesis 17, Genesis 20, the promise is to have a place in the world. In the 20th, the promise is to Abraham, our promise is through Abraham for the world. And you see that in the Psalms particularly, where in Psalm 2, Psalm 72, etc.

The Messiah, the coming king, is the one through whom God's promise blessing to Abraham will extend to the ends of the earth. And chosenness means chosen to carry this promise forward. But that chosenness doesn't in that sense, though, mean God has pre-selected a select group of people who will believe in him and be the king of the kingdom.

That is part of the mystery. And when you get to Romans 8, 28, 29, 30, there is a sense that Paul is saying something which sounds a bit like that. But again, Romans 8 is all about the true climax of the Israel story in the Messiah, and the whole point is it's for the whole creation.

So if we are shaped according to the pattern of the Messiah, the minute we think, "Oh, so we've been chosen, so we're special, so that's fine." We've missed the point because it's so that we are the ones through whom the world will be redeemed. Now, I'm not universalist. That doesn't mean everyone will be saved.

It means I don't think actually that passage Romans 8, 28 to 30 is trying to answer the questions that Calvin and the others who followed him were addressing. When we hear a word like predestination, I think we often read into it. Of course, of course.

Calvin and others say it. And this get, we trip over as well because there have been major philosophical debates about determinism and free will. And the Christian debates about predestination or free choice or whatever are a kind of a theological reflection of those philosophical debates.

And both of the ends of that feel wrong in that we know in our bones that we're not just automata, at least we really think that. It's very hard to imagine that we are simply running on an automatic thing. Equally, we don't want to be like random atomic particles whizzing around without rival reason.

Somewhere there is a balance and the philosophers struggle with it. Here's a picture I've sometimes been given by those who want to reconcile the language of predestination and human freedom and so on. Imagine a flight that's on its way from London to New York.

That flight is predestined. It's scheduled to go there. But it's a free choice of anyone who wants to book themselves into that flight, as it were.

And there's this sense that all those who are in Christ, as it were, are on the flight. But that doesn't mean that there isn't freedom to choose whether you are on that flight. You could get away with that, perhaps, half with a sermon.

I wouldn't like to argue it in a theological seminar. But I think that the fact that we reach for illustrations like that is a way of saying that we know we shouldn't get skewered on the horns of this dilemma. Because, yes, Ephesians 2, "By grace you are saved through faith.

It is not of yourselves. It is the gift of God." Very clear in Paul and in John and all over. But at the same time, if we think that that means, "OK, nothing for me to do," then we've misconstrued it.

Go back to Genesis 1 for goodness sake. Humans are made to be reflecting God's image. That's a vocation.

It's not a passenger. We'll return to more of your questions on the Apostle Paul in a moment's time. An entry right online is the place where you can find all of Tom's online theology courses taught by Tom himself in video format.

We've got another very special offer for podcast listeners. Sign up at their website, www.emptyrightonline.org/askentiright and you can receive Tom Wright's new course on the life of Paul. It's based on the book we've been talking about with him today, Paul of Biography.

It's going to help you understand the mind of Paul, the message you preach and why it matters for the church today as we continue the work he began of bringing Christ to the nations. It's available at a very special listener discount as well. Paul of Biography course is available now.

Podcast listener discount at www.entirightonline.org/askentiright and I'll make sure there's a link in the podcast description today. Lerman in Canada asks a professor right in your book, Paul of Biography. You say that Paul is striking a blow at the very heart of the Eropagus's Rezon Detra when he speaks of a judgment by a resurrected man.

But Paul leaves the democratic jurisprudence structure itself intact. Is it a problem for Christians with their strong sense of the Imago Dei for humanity that the Athenians were first to implement a democratic process? That's quite a big and complex question. It's a great question.

But the Athenians were and weren't democratic in our sense. I mean of course half the Athenian society were slaves and half of the remaining free Athenian society were women. And it was only Athenian citizens, male Athenian citizens who voted.

So from our point of view it's a rather shrunk democracy. And the Athenians may have invented it, but they did funny things with it and it didn't last and the different things happened. What I would want to stress is that for the early Christians like the Jews of the same period, they looked around the world and they saw that many countries had different systems of monarchy and of different whatever.

They weren't terribly interested in how people came to power. They were much more interested in what they did with power once they'd got it. We in the modern western democracies, we think for all sorts of interesting philosophical reasons going back to the 18th century and beyond, we think that voting democratically gives people a mandate to do what they want for the next term in office.

Because they've now been voted so they have the right to do it. And then we have real difficulty holding them to account afterwards. Because the only way we have to hold them to account is not voting for them next time around.

Now, the Athenians as part of their democracy had the system of ostracism where if there was somebody that they really thought was a pain in the neck and we could name various people from British public life right now and possibly even American public life, you could have a vote and you could actually banish somebody for a significant time from the city. Wouldn't that be nice? Well, there were other people who would have to decide. Well, that's true.

But the Athenians knew that they had to have some checks and balances in that system. And then the Romans, often after a magistrate, a consul or a consul or whatever, had their term in office, when their term of office was over, they would often be put on trial for mishandling what they did. Now, we don't usually do that either.

And maybe we should. So when we look at the ancient democracies, we see that they knew they had to have some checks. We have abandoned that because of the 18th century ideology, which I suspect may be partly behind this question, which says that we don't believe in the divine right of kings, so God is out of the political question, so politics just makes itself like a sort of political version of Darwinian evolution.

And then it goes where it goes. And well, look at the 20th century. That's where it goes.

And we ought to be saying, hang on, we need to think more wisely about how to do this. So even though, obviously, our Christian traditions may have shaped what we now embrace in terms of democratic government and so on, that wasn't Paul's primary purpose by any means in terms of shaping that particular way into the government. And yet what's happening with the church is that there is a multi-ethnic, philanthropic, polychrome, worship-based, fictive kinship group.

That's a church, which is exactly what the Romans would have loved to have attained, and they couldn't do it. It's exactly what the European Union would love to attain, but has been able to. It's exactly what America wants to attain, and it's very creaky and difficult.

It shows you that simply instituting a form of government is not necessarily the answer. Exactly. The church ought to be holding up a mirror to the world and saying, actually, we know how to do multicultural society.

I wish that the church did. Final question. Stephen, in Sacramento, California, asks, if you could go back in time and have the chance to interview Paul, what three questions would you ask him? Oh, goodness.

Goodness. If you can't think of three, one or two. Well, there are some classic passages.

I still, when I read 1st Corinthians chapter 11 verses 2 following, which is about women wearing head coverings in church, I think I get what he's basically wanting to say that when women are leading in worship, they should look like women and not be pretend men. That's fine. But the argument he actually uses about the creation of man and woman and the image and so on does seem to me out of kilter with the other things he says about humans being in the image of God.

And I'd love just to tease out whether I'm missing out on something there. I spoke to someone who's written a book on that, and they go down the line that they believe he's quoting others. Yes, I know that argument.

I am not yet convinced by that, but since I read it, I haven't studied it in detail. I haven't been back and actually worked through the detail. That's one thing.

I think I would like to know more about his imprisonment in Ephesus. I've argued in the biography that there was definitely an Ephesian imprisonment and that his suffering there was what caused this deep poetry of Philippians 2 and Colossians 1 and so on to emerge. I'd love to know whether that's actually the right way of looking at that.

I would like to know whether in the dark ten years after he goes back to Tarsus, whether he was ever married, whether he did have a wife and if she left him or died or whatever, we simply don't know. And he is carefully elusive about that in 1 Corinthians 7. So there are questions like that. Of course, the main things would have to do with Jesus.

Paul is a Jesus man. That's what he's most passionately interested in. And it has come back to me who the scholar was, who were trying to rack our reins for, Lucy Pepletz.

Oh, yes. And her book, I think, is Women and Worship at Corinth Paul's rhetorical arguments in 1 Corinthians. So that's one place to go for more on that particular view.

Okay, thank you so much for answering such a wide range of questions on Paul. Thank you. The issue of Women is timely.

We are going to be doing that in a future podcast. So look out for that as well. But for the moment, thank you so much, Tom, for being with me.

Thank you. My pleasure. Well, thank you so much for being with Tom and myself on this week's podcast.

If you're interested in a longer conversation that Tom had with popular historian Tom Holland about Paul, the Roman Empire and the way that Paul's thinking changed the world, we had a fascinating conversation between the two of them on my other podcast, Unbelievable. I'll make sure to include a link to that in the info from today's podcast. Next time here on the Ask N T Right Anything podcast, we're talking Women and Church Leadership, something we began talking about on today's show.

Got a lot more questions for Tom about it next week. Don't forget to sign up to our newsletter at Ask N T Right dot com. Ask your questions there, receive the bonus content, that video of Paul and Tongues that we didn't get to include today, and a chance, of course, to win one of three signed copies of the Bible for everyone.

Just sign up at Ask N T Right dot com. Thanks for being with us this time, and we'll see you for the next episode. You've been listening to the Ask N T Right Anything podcast.

Let other people know about this show by rating and reviewing it in your podcast provider. For more podcasts from Premier, visit premier dot org dot uk slash podcasts. costs.