Some of you might be wondering where I've been for the last few months. Although I've been producing material with mere fidelity and various things with Davenant and Theopolis, having some conversations in other parts of the internet, and writing several articles, I've just not been producing my regular output on my own videos and podcasts. My Biblical Reflections series has been dormant.

What's been going on? Well, back in May I got married, and so I've been enjoying the last few months to settle into married life, to start to build a home, and to really enjoy the early days of our time together. So, at this point, I'm hoping to get into a more regular schedule again, and that will involve starting on the book of Joshua, filling in some of the gaps there, getting into questions of divine violence and how we deal with those sorts of thorny issues, doing a series on money and how Christians can think about money in a more Biblical way, and then also reviving the long, dormant series on ways of judgment with Susanna, who is now my wife. Thank you all for your patience over these last few months.

It's been an absolutely delightful period for me. We had a honeymoon in Vienna in the south of France, we had time with family and friends, and it has been just so refreshing and enjoyable. Thank you for supporting me, thank you for the time that you give to paying attention to my work and interacting with it.

It really means so much, and I'm looking forward to have more engagement with you all in the next few weeks and months. God bless, and thank you for listening.
